Overview

Who approves solar & wind energy projects?

WASHINGTON (AP) — All solar and wind energy projects on federal lands and waters must be personally approved by Interior Secretary Doug Burgum under a new order that authorizes him to conduct “elevated review” of activities ranging from leases to rights of way, construction and operational plans, grants and biological opinions.

Who will decide on wind & solar permitting?

Interior Secretary Doug Burgum will now make the final decision over wind and solar permitting on federal lands that his department owns. The Interior Department said it was ending preferential treatment for renewables and "levelling the playing field" for coal and natural gas.

How does the DOI wind and solar memo work?

Under the DOI Wind and Solar Memo, all covered actions must be submitted for centralized review by the DOI Office of Executive Secretariat and Regulatory Affairs, with subsequent review by the Deputy Secretary of the Interior, and with final approval by the Secretary of the Interior.

Does Burgum have a 'final review' for wind and solar projects?

Burgum will now have "final review" of leases, rights-of-way, construction plans and every other aspect of the Interior Department's federal permitting process for wind and solar projects, according to an internal memo published by the department on Thursday.
